

Curious if Curry will continue his journey with the warriors after his contract expires. aa

A few weeks ago, Steph Curry signed a five-year extension with the Golden State Warriors, adding one year to his current contract for an estimated $62.6 million. This deal, the maximum allowed under the current Collective Bargaining Agreement (CBA), ensures Curry stays with the Warriors through the 2026-27 season, which will mark his 18th year in the NBA.

Given Curry's continued dominance on the court, there's little doubt that, barring injury, he'll not only play beyond this contract but do so at an elite level. Last season, he finished 11th in the league in points per game and led the NBA in three-pointers made by a significant margin. He was also named an All-Star, earned third-team All-NBA honors, and won the inaugural Clutch Player of the Year award. With his skill and leadership, Curry clearly has much more to contribute to the game.

However, Steph Curry has never seemed like the type to extend his playing career just for the sake of it. He's already accomplished more than most, and doesn't need to keep playing to pad his resume or chase additional championships. As a devoted father of four, he likely looks forward to spending more time with his family. Beyond basketball, Curry has a flourishing career in player management and media, and has even entertained the idea of playing professional golf. Additionally, he's expressed interest in owning an NBA team someday. While his focus is fully on the Warriors right now, it's clear that Curry has some exciting ventures awaiting him when he decides to eventually step away from the game.

And when his contract runs out? Well, he'll be 39 years old.

It's an impossible question to answer, and I'm sure he'd be the first to tell anyone that. How well will he be playing in three years? How much treatment will his body need before and after every game? What position are the Warriors in?

There are a lot of factors at play. We know the answers to some of them, we can guess the answers to others, and we're clueless about some.

But I sure as hell hope the answer is yes. Because not only does that mean more time watching Curry, but it almost surely means he's still playing well, and the Warriors are still dominant.

Read More